This single lever design has several advantages, especially in multifamily buildings:

Simplified Operation: User-friendly interconnected locks only require a single motion to lock or unlock both the deadbolt and the latch simultaneously. This ease of operation is particularly beneficial for tenants who may have their hands full or limited mobility.

Enhanced Security: Reduces the risk of accidentally leaving one of the locking mechanisms unlocked, ensuring that the door is properly secured.

Fire Safety: In some building codes and fire safety regulations, interconnected locks are preferred because they allow for quick egress in case of an emergency.

Compliance: In certain regions or jurisdictions, interconnected locks might be required by building codes or security regulations for specific types of properties, including multifamily buildings.

Lockly's smart features allow for remote control, monitoring, and customization of access permissions for property managers and residents. This smart functionality adds an extra layer of convenience and security to the interconnected lock system in multifamily buildings.
